This talk will explore Systems Biology as an approach that, from the outset, combines reduction and integration.

The role of models, both experimental and theoretical, will be discussed, and illustrated using examples of their application to cardiac structure and function research.

Potentials and pitfalls of trying to integrate a complex biological system such as the heart will be considered, as will be the role of failure as a driver of scientific progress.

References